Reception to Follow

50 years ago, in the midst of war, domestic crisis, and a Presidential election, the US lost within two months its two most dynamic and promising leaders, when first Martin Luther King Jr., and then Robert F. Kennedy, were cut down by assassins' bullets. RFK had emerged as the election favorite, building a coalition that cut across all lines of race, age, opinion and social and economic class. He proposed a dramatic project of American renewal, grounded on personal action, peace, love, and the wisdom born from tragedy, in his 1968 Presidential campaign. Jefferson College is hosting Adam Walinsky, RFK's aide and speech writer, to discuss the legacies and relevance of Robert Kennedy and Martin Luther King Jr., and their shared visions for our nation.

"Our violence at home, and in our hearts, is inseparable from that which we visit upon others around the world."
